I'm writing from about 40,000 feet this week, which is more appropriate to be this item is to adjust when your routine is thrown out of whack. If I was asked to raise my hand if my regular training rate was turned off from late, I would like to mount my arm in the air so emphatically I could reach very well the plane itself are on board. In fact, I've been traveling more than I'd like to be in the last two months while working the last stages of the immigration process in the United States. Three years ago, I started this blog. That's what the trip taught me. In May 2016 I started the process with my partner after making the decision to approach the family in Omaha, Neb., where he also accepted a position of university faculty. Since the beginning of the process there has been a great deal of limbo and almost all the flights brought by and to the United States. But now as the process is near an end I'm finding an unexpected silver lining. Of course, I could write a quite substantial piece on how last year did not provide the most ideal of training circumstances, but that you do not feel well - it is not where I am landing. Rather, I'm finding how jet fuel starts to settle, I'm taking into account the growth I've encountered through this process. In a piece several weeks ago I wrote about how I went alone during this transition year and a half; and that I had learned a lot about myself as a runner doing so (especially that I like to be in a team). But beyond that most tangible takeaway is something a little more numb. Through this process I became much better to go with the flow, which was difficult, as I like the routine. There's nothing better for me than getting deep into a training block and feeling on an unbroken roll. I have not experienced this feeling in a couple of years and I look forward to seeing it again. However, I am also now much more aware that routine interruptions and less perfect training blocks are a reality of this sport. Whether it is an immigration process, an injury or any uncontrollable find their way in our lives - the ability to let go, accept reality, and go with the flow - is invaluable and necessary. I like to think that, with a lot of practice, I ammentally harder in the last 18 months in terms of going with the flow. I don't love anymorepoint of destruction on a long period of deficiency, or weak training; and I will give myself a day of rest several times if I feel sick, or just out a great day of travel. That doesn't mean I'm not training with the same intensity I had when I started this trip running almost three years ago. It simply means I'm becoming smarter, and I trust the process and I trust myself. All this, I think, will serve me, as I will enter the next chapter. chapter.
