What type of big dogs don't shed

Shedding is a normal process for most animals with fur and hair, even you. When it stops growing, it sheds. So when it comes to our furry friends like Fido, a number of factors can determine how much they shed, including breed, age and overall health. The season can even influence the amount of shedding, usually most notably in spring.Double-coated dogs like German shepherds and Huskies build undercoats that later shed twice a year, making them among the breeds that shed the most.What if the Shedding Is Excessive?Because of this variation among breeds, there's no real answer as to what's considered abnormal shedding. You have to get to know your pet's own characteristics within your environment, in addition to what's common for its breed.If you notice new shedding and it seems unusual, it could be due to stress, poor nutrition or a medical problem. Maybe your pet has experienced a traumatic event, or you made changes in their food, grooming, medication or other routine.Excessive shedding that leads to bald spots or skin irritation could mean your pet has an allergy. While you would most likely notice a severe case of fleas, lice or mites, the cause could also be due to several less obvious conditions like:Fungal or bacterial infectionsKidney, liver, thyroid or adrenal diseaseExcessive lickingCancerImmune diseaseIf you can't figure it out, talk to your veterinarian who can help determine if your pet's hair loss is part of the normal shedding process or is a symptom of an underlying trauma or disorder.Fuzzy Was He: The Good NewsJust like humans, pets can't do a whole lot about age-related hair loss, but fortunately, most shedding is normal and easily controlled with regular grooming either by you or a professional. There are shampoos to help reduce shedding or soothe irritated skin if you choose to bathe them yourself.Also make sure you select the right tools for your pet's fur. For instance, you wouldn't use a wire rake brush on a short-haired dog or cat, and you'd get nowhere with a stiff bristle brush on a longhaired dog or cat.Diet-related shedding can often be addressed by switching to a high-quality food that contains a proper balance of nutrients. You can also add supplements if you don't want to change your pet's diet.If you want to try and avoid the whole shedding issue (none are 100 percent), go beyond the 'Doodle and check out this list of low-shed dogs. Keep your pet healthy and well-groomed and you're sure to love each other furrever! Ask any dog owner the one downside of sharing a home with their canine BFF, and they'll likely say it's all the dog hair that collects on furniture, floors, and clothing. For many dog lovers, shedding is just part of the trade-off for all the positive aspects of having a pet. But pet dander can significantly exacerbate allergies, and for this reason, some people avoid adding a dog to their household. Although most dogs shed, some breeds shed very little, and other breeds don't shed at all. Coming in miniature, standard, and giant, the Schnauzer is an intelligent, bouncy breed of dog. The Schnauzer's lack of shedding comes from their distinctive two-layer coats. With a unique shape, and a reputation for loyalty, whatever size dog you're after, a Schnauzer could just be the answer to your no-shed needs.Schnauzers do require regular grooming, however, and you have to make sure that you give their mustache a trim too! Capuski / Getty ImagesWith a reputation for silly haircuts, poodles are, in fact, loyal, intelligent dogs. Their distinctive curls mean that they don't shed, although, like a Schnauzer, they rely on regular clipping in order to keep their hair from being out of control.Poodle coats are so no-shed that if they're bred with other dogs, typically, this dog will also be hypoallergenic. dageldog / Getty ImagesIn general, terriers typically have wiry coats, which means they're much less prone to shedding than other kinds of dogs. The Scottish Terrier is a stubborn, determined, and very loyal dog. They have beautifully square heads with large, pointy ears, and their coats only need to be trimmed around twice a year. While the smooth-haired Brussels Griffons are becoming more popular because of their pug-like appearance, it's the long-haired Brussels Griffons that you might want to consider for a low-shed pet. With wiry hair similar to a Schnauzer or a Scottish Terrier, this little dog is packed full of personality. Bearing an uncanny resemblance to an Ewok, the Brussels Griffon is a companionable and highly sociable dog who'll want to go with you everywhere. ginastancel / Getty Images If you're looking for a slightly larger dog, then you might want to look at a Whippet. These sweet-natured dogs are known for being docile and intelligent, as well as very, very fast. When it comes to their shedding, their short, silky coats require very little by way of grooming, and they rarely shed. All they need is an occasional wipe down to keep them smelling good and removing any stubborn dirt. Capuski / Getty Images This Hungarian shepherding breed of dog is quite rare, but they make bouncy, active friends for owners who can keep up with them. A mischievous and highly-spirited dog, they very rarely, if ever, shed their coats. However, with those gorgeous curls, their grooming takes quite a lot of upkeep, so it's quite common to trim their coats very short. The elegant Saluki is the royal dog of Egypt and has a very short coat with a longer, feathered coat around the ears and tail. Originally a hunting dog, this breed has a reputation for being independent and almost aloof, although they bond very strongly with their owners. Like the whippet, their coat typically just needs a little light wiping down. A mix of a Golden Retriever and a Poodle, the Goldendoodle is a cheerful and active dog that is great for families with young children. Their coats do require regular clipping; however, they have the coat of a poodle rather than a Retriever, so they rarely shed. A Goldendoodle is also a fantastic option if somebody in need of a service dog. Especially if they experience allergies and need a dog that sheds less than a Retriever. Scottish Deerhounds are gentle giants, and thanks to their long, wiry coats, they rarely shed. While they do need to be brushed weekly to ensure that they don't have any matting of their coats, this is something that can be done at home. Quiet, docile, and faithful, these dogs make excellent companions and love long walks. nemoris / Getty Images Another Hungarian dog, like its native sibling the Puli, Komondor's have fabulous, curly coats that hardly shed at all. Known also as Hungarian Sheepdogs, these dogs were bred to guard over livestock. Today, these protective, intelligent dogs make excellent companions and guard dogs. The thick coat of a Komondor makes elegant dreadlocks, and these need to be untangled to stop them from getting too matted. Smart and people-oriented, the Kerry blue terrier is a strikingly beautiful breed. Their coats range from a light blue-gray to a dark, deep-gray, or slate color. Like many other terriers, Kerries don't shed and are a great choice for owners concerned about pet dander. Even so, they do require some weekly grooming to keep their coats soft and mat-free. Size-wise, this Irish breed stands between 17 and 20 inches tall and weighs between 35 and 40 pounds when fully grown. Kerries are excellent family dogs, but they are athletic and energetic. They need lots of exercise. Although this web-footed dog may look similar to Portuguese water dogs, Poodles, or the Lagotto Romagnolo, it's a distinct breed. Canine experts believe that farmers developed the breed in Spain as an all-around pet and working companion for hunting, herding, and water work. The coat requires very little maintenance and no brushing, just a yearly all-over clip. For those seeking a larger-sized family dog, the Spanish water dog is a great choice. Breeders say its coat may occasionally lose a few hairs, but the breed doesn't shed. An ancient breed, the Xolotlzcuintli, or Mexican hairless, has been around for 3000 years. The breed has two coat varieties. The hairless variety doesn't shed. The coated varieties may experience minimal shedding. The official breed description recognizes three different sizes: toy, miniature, and standard. These sensitive dogs seek structure and consistency and respond well to gentle training. Despite their somewhat fragile appearance, Xolos are athletic dogs that enjoy a lot of interaction with their human companions. TaynaPanova / Getty Images This sturdy, dignified breed has a beautiful, silky coat and doesn't shed. A soft topknot adorns the top of their large heads like a crown. Breeders in Scotland originally developed them to hunt otters and badgers, so their long torsos are low-to-the-ground, making it easier to chase their prey into burrows. Despite their smaller stature, Dandies have a surprisingly deep, baritone bark, and they make excellent watchdogs. The Dandie is an affectionate yet independent and strong-willed dog, and calmer than some other terrier breeds. CaptureLight / Getty Images Spotted skin and spiked hair are defining physical characteristics of this toy dog. The breed has two types of coats, the hairless and the coated or powderpuff varieties. The hairless variety doesn't shed. They have tufts of hair on their tail, ankles, and head. The powderpuff coats are unusual because the undercoat is shorter than the longer outer coat. This coat is genetically recessive. Some people describe these gentle canines as Dr. Seuss dogs because they closely resemble pet illustrations from the books. Cresteds have no "doggy" odor and feel extreme devotion to their human companions. Kseniya Abramova / Getty Images Potential pet owners who love fluffy dogs but want to avoid shedding issues should consider the Bolognese, an ancient breed with Roman roots. The Bolognese's furry coat doesn't shed, although its soft, white, cotton-like fur does need daily brushing to keep it free of mats and tangles. This playful pup is easy-going and intelligent. It reaches a height of 10 to 12 inches. Although the Bolognese loves people, it tends to be shy around strangers. They are happier in households where they don't spend extended periods of time alone. sssss1gmel / Getty Images At first glance, this breed's calm, outgoing, and noble appearance is misleading. Breeders originally developed the Welsh terrier to be a fierce hunter. They resemble a small Airedale, and like other terriers, don't shed. For centuries, hunters chose these dogs for hunting foxes, otters, and badgers in the remote areas of Northern Wales. The Welsh's hunting instinct is a deeply embedded behavior. They'll stalk any small animals, including cats, that cross their paths. If you're seeking a lap dog, the Welsh probably isn't the best breed choice for you. But if you seek an independent, active canine who won't leave piles of hair on your furniture and is fun to have around, this breed is an excellent choice. DevaDDO / Getty Images Happy, loving, and people-oriented, the "Little Lion Dog" has been around since the Middle Ages, according to dog historians. Yet, the American Kennel Club didn't officially recognize the Lowchen breed until 1999. Although the breed sports a beautiful, long coat, it doesn't shed. Those seeking a pet that has the pizzazz and visual appeal of a long-haired breed without all the issues that come with constant shedding will love this little canine. These playful dogs are fun, intelligent, and charming pets. They're easy to train and are great additions for family households. volofin / Getty Image Hidden behind lavish tufts of hair that covers its face, the Sealyham terrier is the feisty comedian of the terrier world. Extremely affectionate, they make excellent companions and pack a lot of personality inside their small stature. Their white, waterproof coat doesn't shed. Despite their sweet and expressive appearance, they bark with the ferocity of a big dog, which also makes them a great watchdog. Sealsy easily adapt to both city and country living. Breeders developed the breed with crosses between Corgis, Dandie Dimonts terriers, West Highland terriers, Bull terriers, and others. The Affenpinscher's coat is harsh and dense. While you may find a few loose hairs here and there, they experience minimal shedding. Cross a curious, cute monkey with a scaled-down Wookiee, and that's a great visual description of an Affenpinscher's face. While it is adorable, Affens offer so much more. This little breed is fearlessly confident and exhibits some serious attitude when focused on a task. It comes as no surprise that the French translation for Affenpinscher is "mustached little devil." People who want a sturdy, loyal, and affectionate pet can't go wrong if they choose to share their home with the Affenpinscher. Evgeniya Shihaleeva / Getty Images 1 / 26Konstantin Zaykov/ShutterstockPeople who are allergic to dogs, but still love them, have surely wondered if there are any "hypoallergenic" dogs that won't trigger their symptoms, and while there are more breeds of dogs than you might think that don't shed too much, one of the most common pet-related myths is that dog hair is what causes the allergies. But it's not—it's actually the pet dander (the skin flakes that they shed). True, dogs that don't shed as much release less of this dander, but, "while you may have less dog hair with a nonshedding dog, no dog breed is hypoallergenic," the Mayo Clinic warns. If you do have a dog allergy, they recommend bathing your pet every week to remove dander, as well as considering getting a smaller dog, which will produce less dander. Fortunately, many of these dogs that don't shed a lot are on the smaller side. So whether you're allergic to dogs or would just rather have a dog that doesn't shed massive amounts of fur, check out this list of dogs that don't shed a lot. Plus: Do you know how much is REALLY costs to own a dog? 2 / 26Didkovska Ilona/ShutterstockAccording to the American Kennel Society (AKC), this toy-sized terrier breed boasts a wiry coat that sheds minimally and, for the most part, seasonally. (All dogs, and you, yourself, shed some hair every single day.) As an extra added bonus, its coat and skin give off very little perceptible "doggy" odor. The German name means "monkey-like," which may refer to the Affenpinscher's appearance as well as its intelligence and good humor. But please note that in France, the breed is referred to as "Diablotin Moustachu," which means mustachioed little devil! Of course, shedding isn't the only thing that makes a dog the right dog for you—factor in these other considerations to pick the best dog for your family. 3 / 26Anna Goroshnikova/ShutterstockThe aristocratic-looking Afghan hound is a "special breed for special people," according to the AKC. On the one hand, its long, silky coat is breathtakingly gorgeous and sheds only minimally. That said, its crowning glory requires twice-per-week bathing and brushing to maintain its luxurious look and feel. In addition, Afghans are emotionally aloof but incredibly agile and energetic, meaning they require regular exercise (perhaps even agility training) to reach their true potential as happy household pets. 5 / 26Fotoeventis/ShutterstockThe Barbet is a mid-sized water dog, which means it was bred to retrieve hunted game, including ducks from water. The Barbet is indigenous to France, dating back to the 16th century, and relatively rare in the United States—probably the rarest on this list of dogs that don't shed a lot, but perhaps that should change considering how intelligent and calm this adorable muppet-like breed is. Just be sure to give your Barbet enough exercise to keep him happy and please be aware that the AKC says the Barbet is affectionately referred to as the "mud dog" since he enjoys romping through any kind of water, including muddy water. 6 / 26Grisha Bruev/ShutterstockA member of the hound family, the Basenji is perfect for anyone who appreciates the affable, almost comic personality of a hound but doesn't relish the distinctive odor and shedding habits for which many hounds are known. Its short, fine coat sheds minimally, and gives off very little "dog" smell. As an extra added bonus, the Basenji is surprisingly quiet for a hound, making it an ideal "apartment dog" just as long as you're willing to take it out for daily exercise and play. If "quiet" is high on your list of priorities in choosing a dog, you'll want to check out these 13 quietest dog breeds. 7 / 26Piotr Zajda/Shutterstock"Bedlingtons are lithe, energetic Englishmen," according to the AKC, with a "crisp, curly coat" that sheds only minimally and requires little in the way of grooming beyond brushing (to prevent matting) and occasional trimming. Small-sized, affable, and incredibly energetic, the Bedlington is one of the top choices for an active, fun-loving family on this list of dogs that don't shed. 8 / 26Vladimir Nenezic/ShutterstockFriendly, great with kids, and not particularly demanding in terms of its exercise needs, the Bichon Frise sheds very little and makes a great apartment or city dog. Although it doesn't shed very much, it does require regular grooming to keep its fur fluffy, clean, and mat-free. Check out 10 high-tech gadgets you and your pet will love. 9 / 26otspphoto/ShutterstockDespite being toy-sized, the Brussels Griffon isn't your typical pampered purse puppy. The "Griff" likes to assert its outsized personality and garner attention with its fringy beard and mustache and it's soulful almost-human-looking eyes. Some Griffis have a smooth coat (like a Pug), and some have a rough coat (like a Schnauzer), but none of them shed more than minimally, although all require regular grooming as well as daily walks and plenty of attention. 10 / 26Bgrapher/ShutterstockThe hairless variety of the Chinese Crested isn't exactly hairless in that it has tufts of fur on its feet and head that require regular trimming. But you won't have to deal with much in the way of shedding, and this is true even for the "powderpuff" variety of Chinese Crested. With low exercise needs and a reserved demeanor for anyone but its own "pack" (i.e., you and your family), the Chinese Crested is a great doggie for apartment dwellers and anyone with low mobility. 11 / 26Nicole Lienemans/ShutterstockSmall and affectionate with a soft, long, white coat that doesn't shed, the one drawback to a Coton de Tulear (besides the challenging pronunciation, which is coTAWN day two-LEE), is that it does need regular grooming to keep its fur full and mat-free. Learn the best way to train a puppy. 12 / 26Dorottya Mathe/ShutterstockThese native Cuban dogs offer owners both their patented spunky charm and a coat that doesn't shed, which means less time spent lint-rolling the furniture and more time romping with the playful Havanese. Their coat requires weekly brushing and regular baths to keep them clean and healthy. 13 / 26Radomir Rezny/ShutterstockLike the Barbet, the Irish Water Spaniel was bred to retrieve hunted game from the water. The Irish Water Spaniel's coat is thick and curly and requires brushing only every couple of weeks. Fun, funny, and fun-loving, potential parents of these dogs that don't shed a lot should be aware that this is a highly energetic breed and needs daily exercise. 14 / 26Radomir Rezny/ShutterstockAs its name suggests, the Kerry Blue Terrier's coat comes in varying shades of blue, from light blue-gray to dark. But perhaps most importantly, its coat sheds minimally and is super soft and dense. If you like beard-trimming, this mid-sized breed's for you since the long hair on its face it requires grooming. 15 / 26aurelie le moigne/ShutterstockThis ancient Tibetan breed of lapdog has long, luxurious hair that, happily, doesn't shed. Calm and playful, the Lhasa Apso likes going for walks but is also perfectly happy to sit on your lap or lie beside you on the sofa. The Lhasa's long hair requires some maintenance to keep it mat-free and silky, but lots of Lhasa owners get around that with a cute, cropped "puppy cut" to avoid daily brushing and grooming. 16 / 26Dora Zett/ShutterstockThe Maltese (aka Maltese Terrier) is big in personality and, so small in size, in fact, it's one of the 13 of the world's teeny-tiniest dog breeds. Energetic and agile, the Maltese is highly trainable but not necessarily wonderful with small children. If you're past the young-kids stage and you're looking for a miniature dog that sheds almost not at all (they have no undercoat, which means even on a seasonal basis, they have no need to shed for the purpose of changing their coat), this is the pup for you. 17 / 26Evdoha.spb/ShutterstockAnother hairless breed, the Peruvian Inca Orchid comes in small, medium, and large. And regardless of its size, it's extremely loyal, if not flat-out protective of its people. Keep the Peruvian Inca Orchid well-exercised and make sure to coat him in sunscreen because he's prone to sunburn. 18 / 26Evdoha.spb/ShutterstockLike the Peruvian Inca Orchid, the Poodle comes in just about any size. Unlike the Peruvian Inca Orchid, the Poodle isn't hairless...far from it, in fact. However, poodles are famous for not shedding and even being "hypoallergenic" dogs (or at least relatively so). However, these dogs that don't shed a lot are known for their high-maintenance grooming routine. 19 / 26Steve Bruckmann/ShutterstockWhat do you get when you cross one dog that doesn't shed with another dog that doesn't shed? If you guessed "a dog that doesn't shed," then you're correct! That's why Maltipoos (a cross between a Poodle and a Maltese) are dogs that don't shed a lot. The same goes for Schnoodles (a cross between a Poodle and a Schnauzer). In fact, all hybrids that are at least half Poodle tend to be minimal shedders. Highly intelligent, Poodle hybrids are also high energy, so you'll want to give yours lots of exercise to keep him happy. Here's what it will take before the Maltipoos and Schoondles are recognized as an official breed by the AKC. 20 / 26Scott F Smith/ShutterstockIf you think you've never heard of the Portuguese Water dog, then may we remind you that the adorable Bo Obama, and Sunny Obama, First Dogs during the Obama Administration, are Portuguese Water dogs? Medium-sized, friendly, and high energy, the Portuguese Water dog is famous also for its webbed feet, as well as for being hypoallergenic dogs. We dare you to check one out and not fall in love. But don't bring one into your family if you're not prepared to give him lots of exercise. Check out the most bizarre pets of presidents. 21 / 26otspphoto/ShutterstockSchnauzers come in all sizes, and all of them have thick, wiry coats that shed only minimally but do require weekly brushing and regular grooming—especially of their facial hair (the breed name refers to the German word for a whiskery snout, and you'll always recognize Schnauzers by their long, luxuriant mustaches and beards). Schnauzers of any size, in addition to being dogs that don't shed a lot, are incredibly charming and cheerful, as well as highly trainable. 22 / 26Stephm2506/ShutterstockAnother wire-haired breed, the Scottish Terrier is another dog that doesn't shed but that needs regular brushing and grooming to keep its coat healthy. Clever and independent, Scotties are known for their strong instinct to go after prey, which traditionally consisted of rats and other vermin. However, they can't always tell the difference between vermin and tiny house pets, so please be sure to keep that in mind when bringing a Scotty home. 23 / 26Dipali S/ShutterstockWhile many minimally-shedding terriers have wiry coats, the Soft Coated Wheaten terrier has the wonderful distinction of having...wait for it...a soft coat. Playful, active, and hungry for play, if you're in the market for dogs that don't shed and you have young kids, the Soft Coated Wheaten is definitely worth considering. 24 / 26John Ceulemans/ShutterstockAnother water dog, the Spanish Water dog is not only loyal and affectionate, but its curly coat requires no brushing! All you need to do to take care of your Spanish Water dog's coat is to shave it once a year. This breed isn't the most active on this list, but it does require regular exercise. These are the most common mistakes every dog owner makes. 25 / 26Sergey Lavrentev/ShutterstockYou'll recognize a West Highland White Terrier (aka "Westie") by its white coat, which, happily, hardly sheds. A sturdy little breed, Westies are intelligent, loyal, happy, and highly entertaining due to their curiosity and independent streak. That also means they can be challenging to train. But they'll keep you laughing while they're blatantly ignoring your commands, so there's that. 26 / 26Steve Bruckmann/ShutterstockIf you're always cold, you'll feel a real connection with a Yorkshires Terrier (aka "Yorkie"). Perhaps the smallest non-shedder on this list of dogs that don't shed, Yorkies range in size from itsy bitsy (3 pounds) to teeny-tiny (7 pounds). Independent, smart, and affectionate, they have a surprising amount of energy for their size. Be sure to give these dogs that don't shed a lot plenty of opportunities to socialize as puppies if you want them to be friendlier as adults. You'll also want to avoid these 12 other puppy training mistakes. Originally Published: August 21, 2019Originally Published on Reader's Digest
