The total quality management or TQM creates a strategic focus on an entire organization on continuous improvement based on customer needs. Starting from the 1980s and reaching its largest popularity in the 1990s, TQM served as a predecessor for the management of quality and six sigma initiatives. To be able to change the corporate culture by applying TQM requires the involvement and support support. Initiation of a TQM program with its associated costs and cultural change requires commitment by senior executives. Before starting a TQM program, the managers of business management and division need training in TQM base techniques and access to data that demonstrate productivity and advantage of approach costs. After training, senior management should appoint a TQM manager or instigator to develop an implementation strategy and work with human resources to create employee training programs. Select a manager with the possibility to control resources and with direct and frequent access to senior management. The TQM manager needs to create a team of well-informed line managers on TQM to support and communicate the basic principles and behaviors provided for in a TQM-based organization. The facilitators help to acquire resources, making available to time for training and recognizing and reinforcing individual employees for their quality efforts and ideas for continuous improvement. It is the work of line managers to facilitate TQM adoption in areas and remove barriers to implementation. Use of managers to train employees in TQM, rather than using external consultants or human resource trainers, communicates the perceived importance of TQM to society. Being requested to teach TQM leads to greater competence in the management staff, because they must understand the approach and techniques to teach them to employees. If managers cannot teach the entire TQM course, they should strengthen the importance of each class of training by introducing the executive commitment of training and rest towards the process. Managers should submit planning and results based on TQM during routine staff meetings and individual performance reviews. The managers must practice TQM, as well as preaching, using data collection and data planning tools such as flowcharts, causes and effects diagrams. Use the customer's preferences data to guide the decision-making process. Provide frequent reports to staff and senior management highlighting the continuous improvement of key performance indicators.
