If you like, you'll find the book after the book with Abandon.but it turns out that plowing the stories, we could lose a key step: prediction. According to educators, we should get our children to think about what he is reading before starting. Otis Kriegel, an elementary school teacher in New York City, explains why in this video: when your son takes the time to contemplate what is going to read, making predictions based on what already know, will be more invested in history and More likely to understand and preserve the material. It's not about being right or wrong in the end, but about sparking that feeling of A e a, ~ A "oooh, I can't wait to find out what happens next! A, a, ~ "That feeling, of course, is what runs in readers throughout my life. Here are some ways to help children Children predict what is reading: shows them the cover and ask, A e A, ~ "What do you think of this book? Why? "Take a A e a, ~ A "Picture walkA,A »suggests Kriegel. Abbiata The pages of the book illustrated, and without reading words, let them train your ideas about history. (If their ideas are far away - let's say, The images show a tractor on a farm and your son hypothesizes that the monkeys will descend from the outer space "having a discussion after finishing the book on how the illustrations give clues to history.) Use Post-Its to cover important words in history and See if they manage to guess what those words are when they land on them. In the middle of a story, stop and ask them what they think it will happen on the next page. Use A e a, ~ "think _____ because _____ A e a, ~ Structure. If you are in worksheets, make them compile this to help them organize their thoughts. After the final page, ask, A e a, ~ "If I could write the next chapter, what would happen? A, a, ~ It helps them stay curious even after the story ends.
